Maggie Ollove designs innovative services with a human-centered approach. In her current work at the Center for Civic Design, Maggie leads projects to learn how voters get informed and transforms election procedures for state and local election offices.

Previously she worked to solve the challenge of child care for low-income families by co-founding Gma Village - a service that builds relationships between grandmothers and parents to exchange child care. She brings her skills in design-led research, workshop facilitation, and prototyping to find innovative solutions to social challenges. She holds an MFA from the Transdisciplinary Design program at Parsons the New School for Design.
